Now the others began to laugh, too. Fogg was a proud man and their laughter made him angry. He stood up and looked at them.

"I'll bet you I can do it."

"I'd like to see you! And I'll bet you four thousand pounds that you can't!"

"And I'll bet you twenty thousand that I can!"

Fogg's friends looked at each other. It was a lot of money. They went and talked about it in a corner of the room. When they agreed that Fogg could not win, Stuart turned to him.

"We accept!"

Fogg looked at them calmly.

"Excellent! Today is Wednesday, 2nd October, 1872. The train to Dover leaves at 8:45 pm. I'll be on it and I'll be back in this room on Saturday 21st December at 8:45 pm—after a trip around the world. Goodnight, gentlemen!"

Fogg marched out of the room and left the Reform Club for his home.

Fogg's valet was shocked to see his master arrive home so early. Jean Passepartout was a pleasant young Frenchman with curly brown hair and a moustache. Although he was rather new in his position with Mr Fogg, he knew that if his master said he would be home at midnight—as he was every night of his life—he meant exactly at midnight and not a minute before or after.

"Passepartout! We are catching the 8:45 to Dover! Don't pack any bags. We're travelling light."

"What do you mean, sir?"

"We're going around the world in eighty days! Bring my travelling coat."

Passepartout was too shocked to speak; he simply did as his master told him. He rushed upstairs thinking about the many kinds of jobs he had in the past, when he was still in France—a singer, a fire fighter, a teacher of gymnastics, even a circus acrobat—he was so tired of travelling from place to place! He took the job with Fogg hoping to work in a normal, stable home where life was as regular as clockwork. Until now, he thought he had.

With a long face, Passepartout carried out the order, while his master prepared for the journey. Fogg took twenty thousand pounds from his safe and put the money in a small travelling bag. He also packed The Daily Telegraph, which showed their route, and a guidebook with the timetables they would need for the trains and ships. When Passepartout returned, Fogg gave him the bag.

“This is everything we need, including twenty thousand pounds. Take care of it!”

Passepartout nervously took the bag and followed his master into a cab for Charing Cross railway station.
