

DISCOVER
our AMAZING WORLD
CLIL READERS

THE

maori

PEOPLE

Virginia Evans
Jenny Dooley

Express Publishing

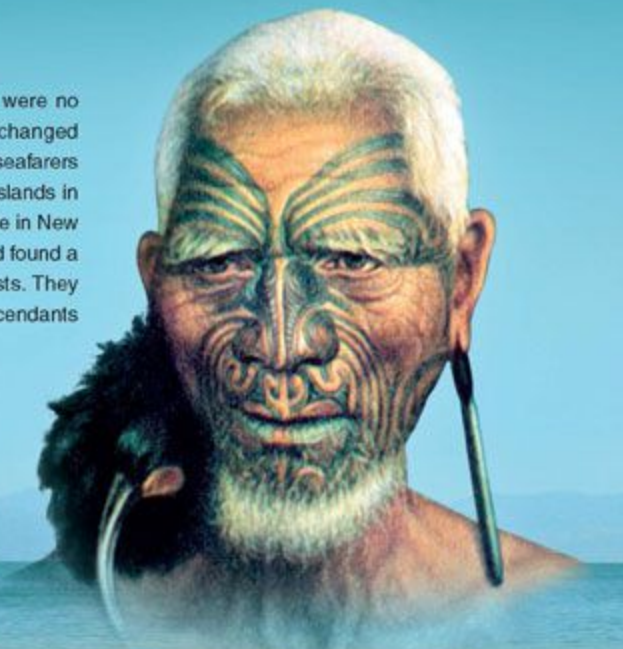

Contents

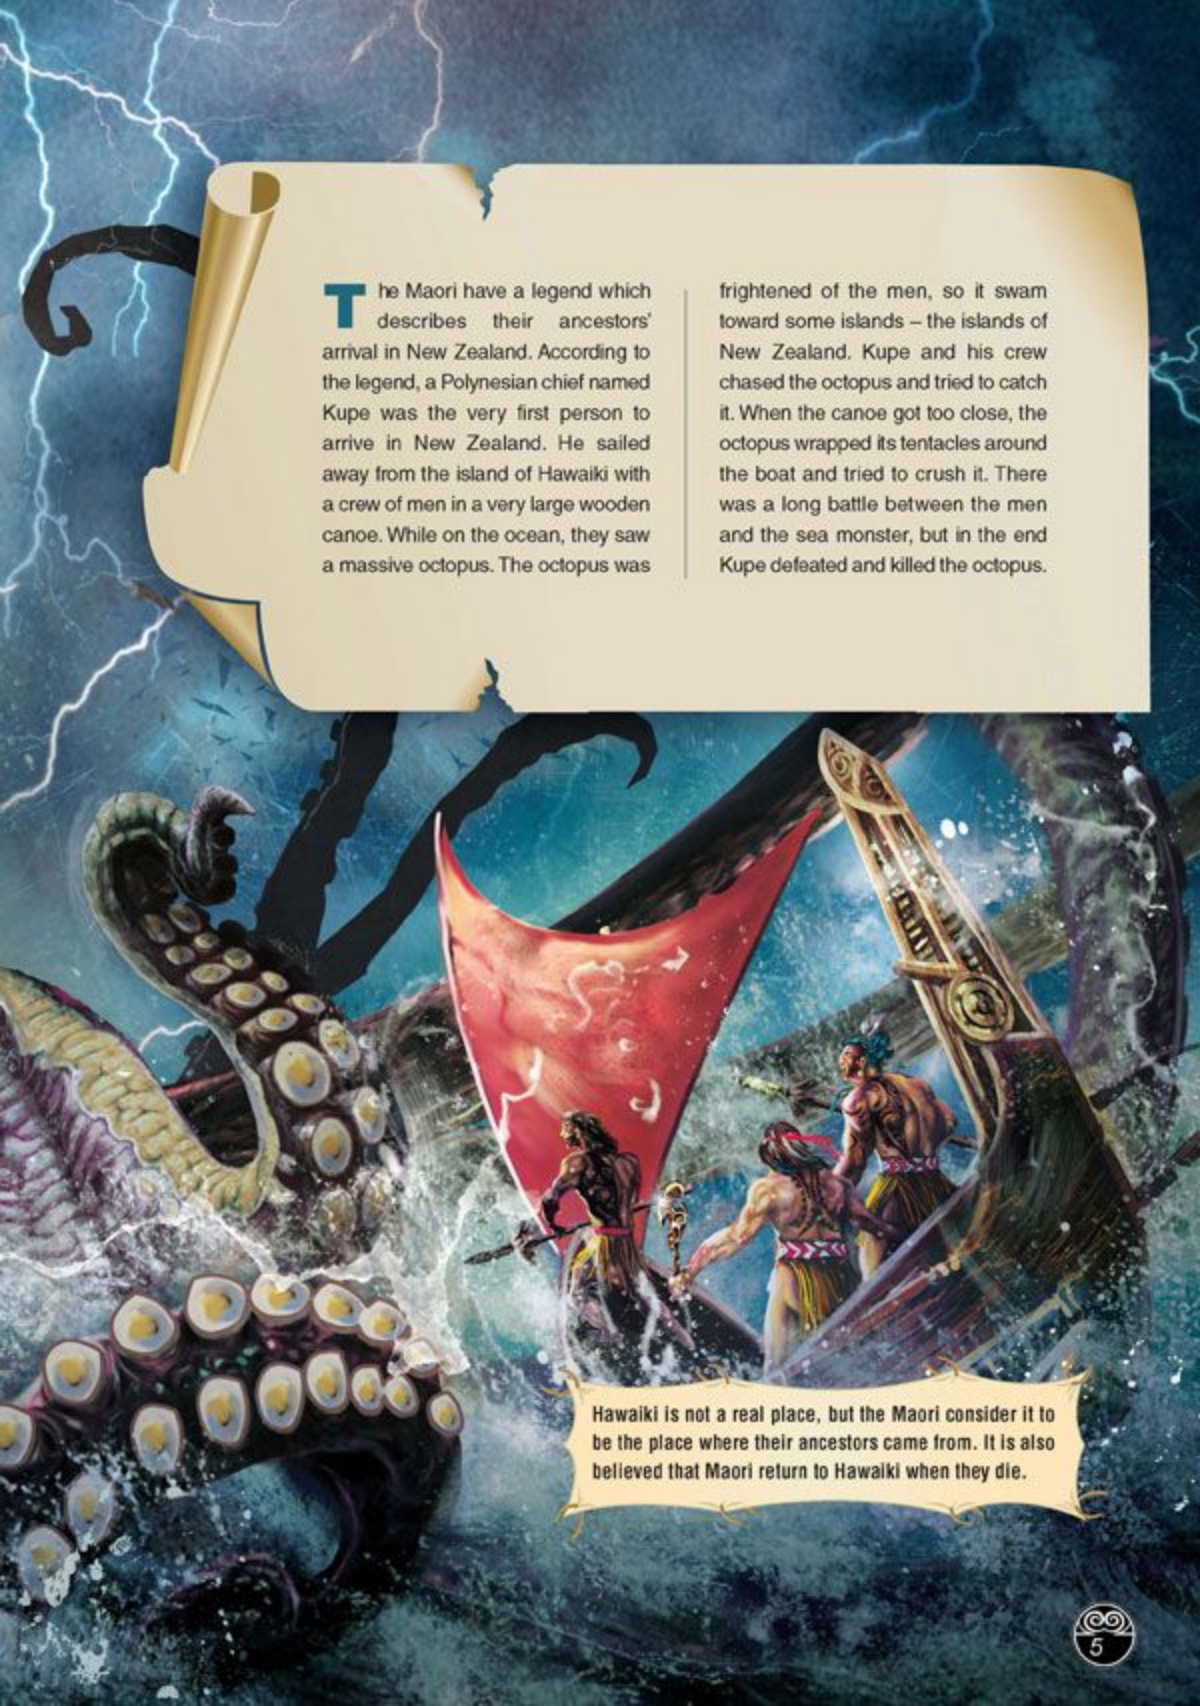

The Discovery of New Zealand	4
Friends, Family & Foes	10
Looks & Clothes	14
Maori Meals	18
Maori Spirituality	22
A Traditional Greeting	28
Unwelcome Change	32
Road to Recovery	36
The Myths of the Maori	38
Activities:	40
Review:	58
Reading in Context:	62
Amazing Facts:	64

The Discovery of New Zealand

Until less than a thousand years ago, there were no human inhabitants in New Zealand. That changed sometime between 1150 and 1350 CE. A group of seafarers set out from Polynesia, a collection of over 1,000 islands in the Pacific Ocean, and were the first people to settle in New Zealand. They traveled to the islands in canoes and found a land of mountains, green hills, and beautiful coasts. They established communities and never left. Their descendants still live there today. They are the Maori people.

The Maori have a legend which describes their ancestors' arrival in New Zealand. According to the legend, a Polynesian chief named Kupe was the very first person to arrive in New Zealand. He sailed away from the island of Hawaiki with a crew of men in a very large wooden canoe. While on the ocean, they saw a massive octopus. The octopus was frightened of the men, so it swam toward some islands – the islands of New Zealand. Kupe and his crew chased the octopus and tried to catch it. When the canoe got too close, the octopus wrapped its tentacles around the boat and tried to crush it. There was a long battle between the men and the sea monster, but in the end Kupe defeated and killed the octopus.

Hawaiki is not a real place, but the Maori consider it to be the place where their ancestors came from. It is also believed that Maori return to Hawaiki when they die.

After the battle, Kupe observed the land that the octopus had led them to. It was a newly-discovered place for Kupe and his crew. He got off the canoe to explore. He traveled all over New Zealand's North Island, giving names to the places he saw. He eventually returned to Hawaiki and told his people about the new land. Kupe never returned to New Zealand, but his people did. They made this new island their home.

